A NOTE FROM THE CO-ORGANIZER

Two mature markets. Two different languages.

Brazil and the United States both have deep, sophisticated real estate markets. Brazilian developers build at scale and know how to deliver through high interest rates and volatile cycles. American real estate has spent decades turning buildings into an asset class that pension funds, endowments and sovereign wealth funds buy with confidence.

Both markets are advanced, and they work in very different ways. Contracts, reporting, capital structures, the role of the public sector, even the definition of a good deal: almost every layer follows its own rules. That distance has a cost. Brazilian projects that would hold up anywhere often fail to reach global institutional capital, and the reason is rarely the return. They are hard to read from the outside.

The BR/USA Real Estate Forum was created to shorten that distance. For one day in New York, people who build, finance and regulate real estate in both countries sit in the same room and compare notes openly, looking for what each side can improve.

Copying the American model is not the point. The useful question is which internal practices Brazil can update, in governance, transparency, risk presentation and capital structuring, so that global institutional investors can come in with the same ease they find in other markets.

I hope you will join us in New York.

One of the world's largest real estate markets, hard to read from abroad.

Foreign money keeps arriving in Brazil. Very little of it reaches real estate, and global institutions own almost none of the market.

The plumbing is being rebuilt right now.

Brazil's real estate credit only crossed 10% of GDP in 2025. In the US, mortgage debt across all property types stands near 70%. The gap is funding structure, not demand, and that structure has just started to change.

FUNDING SHARE OF BRAZILIAN REAL ESTATE CREDIT

In 2023, capital-markets instruments overtook savings deposits for the first time as the largest source of real estate funding in Brazil. By 2025 they supplied ~44% of it. The October 2025 savings reform speeds up the move toward the US model, where 64% of mortgage debt is funded through capital markets.

THIS CONVERSATION IS PANEL 2 — CAPITAL STACK: US VS. BRAZIL

The asset institutional capital knows best doesn't exist in Brazil yet.

Multifamily is the largest traditional property type in the US institutional universe. In Brazil, rental housing is not yet an asset class: ownership is fragmented, retail-held and unread by institutions. That gap is the opportunity.

Bridging Brazil to the world's most mature real estate market.

80 hand-picked leaders of Brazilian real estate (CEOs, CIOs, developers and fund managers) come to New York to compare notes with their American counterparts on governance, capital structuring and institutional transparency. Co-organized by Responsive Cities Institute (OSPA) and NYU Schack Institute of Real Estate.

Affordability: Subsidy, Cost and Capital

Between what it costs to build and what a renter can pay, there is a gap. At the bottom of the market, the US closes it with tax credits and vouchers. In the middle, workforce housing has no subsidy and has to close it through construction cost, unit design and project finance. What each path asks of the developer, and what Brazil can take from it.
